Mystery surrounds the death of Robert Hall, a colored man, thirty-five years old, who was found last Sunday morning about 10 o'clock, bleeding and unconscious, lying beside the tracks of the Rockville and Georgetown Electric railway, about one mile this side of Bethesda. While Mr. Hall was lying on the ground, a white motor car, with a man running toward Tenleytown, he noticed the body, and had he not applied the brakes quickly, would have crushed it under the wheels of the car.

Hall was taken aboard and conveyed to Georgetown Hospital, where he died shortly afterward, without regaining consciousness. The body was soon after removed to the District morgue, where an autopsy was made by Deputy Coroner Glazebrook to determine the cause of death. Considerable trouble was encountered in identifying the injured man, and several hours elapsed before his relatives were located.

The coroner at first expressed the belief that the man had been hurt by a moving car. The autopsy, however, developed the fact that undoubtedly the man was the victim of a murderous assault. His injury was a badly fractured skull, and showed a large laceration behind the ear, such as might have been inflicted by a blunt weapon. Hall had been employed by Lee Offutt on his farm near this town.
